

Some Easy Methods To Approach Training Your Dog

There's nothing more irritating than a naughty boisterous dog. Just like a disobedient, naughty child, a badly behaved dog can drive you round the bend. If you have recently acquired a new puppy, you really need to know about the basics of dog training.

Many people incorrectly believe that not every dog can be trained. This is not the case. All dogs can be trained. Certainly, some are harder to train and others are easier to train. The success rate depends largely on the trainer's skills and experience.

A trained dog is a happy dog. Dogs are programmed to take commands. This comes from their inherent instinct to obey the 'alpha' figure when they live in packs. Your dog must be taught that you are in this role. A well trained dog is also more secure, less stressed, and he or she will form a close bond with you.

Teaching your dog his or her name is the first thing to do. This will enable you to get a response from the dog every time you call its name. This forms the basis to all other dog training lessons.

The first important command is 'come'. Hold a small treat near the nose and firmly call its name, for example 'Fluffy, come!' The puppy will immediately come forward to get the treat. Continue the process by stepping a bit further back each time. When the dog responds and comes to you, lavish it with lots of praise and affection.

Use the same method when you teach 'sit' and 'stay'. Always talk in a firm tone whilst giving a dog commands so he or she can identify the varying tones of your voice. Your dog will soon learn when you are playful or when you mean business! Praising is essential because every dog wants to please his or her 'master'.

Don't get too carried away with treats. They are necessary tools in the early phases of training, but too many treats may cause the dog to obey your commands just because there's a treat to follow. The dog will learn that if you are obeyed, his or her reward is praise and love. Never give your dog treats outside of training sessions. This can cause confusion.

If you want to compete at dog shows and other competitions, it's advisable for you and your dog to attend a professional dog training course. You will both learn the relevant behavior requirements and other etiquette rules. There's plenty of helpful websites about such courses.
