

Things To Consider When Choosing A Dog Breed

It is not always a good idea to choose a dog based on how cute you think it is. Rather, there are many important things to consider before choosing a dog breed or before deciding what type of dog to get. Since a dog will inexorably become part of your family, you should be careful in selecting one because otherwise you may have a mismatch.

Smaller breeds are appropriate for young families that often have many activities going at once. Jack Russell Terriers, Chihuahuas, and Pugs are examples of small breed dogs. These dogs are great for young and busy families because they are not as tall as other dogs, and thus cannot reach high places. For instance, if a toddler leaves his ham sandwich on the edge of the kitchen table, a small dog will be much less likely to be able to reach it than, say, a Labrador.

Another benefit of smaller dogs is that they are basically harmless. They may deliver a small bite, but they are not as dangerous as larger dogs. A dog's violence has a lot to do with its training, but it is safer to go with a small dog if you have smaller children. Children often play with dogs as if they are toys, and may mistakenly upset their dog and receive a nip.

Medium-sized dogs are a good middle-ground between small and large dogs, as they cannot reach very high-up places yet they also offer some degree of protection. They are also adorable. Medium breeds include Beagles, Cocker Spaniels, and Corgis.

Larger dogs are perfect for families who want a dog to be both a protector and a friend. They are also great for families that are very organized in terms of setting up their home so that their dog does not have easy access to "forbidden" objects. Large dogs, such as German Shepherds, Labradors, Golden Retrievers, and Great Danes, are strong and may almost be like having another human in the family, as they can be very big.

Of course, everyone has a different set of preferences when it comes to dog breeds. Some breeds bark more than others, and some are more trainable than others. The most important thing, then, is that the dog that you choose will fit perfectly into your family.

Another important aspect when it comes to getting any dog breed is training. Large or small size is less important than level of training. A well-trained large dog will not jump on furniture or kitchen counters, and thus may be just as appropriate for busy families as smaller dogs are.

About the Author

Get more great tips on Choosing A Dog Breed

Source: <http://anythingaboutpets.com>