

How To Train A Dog Not To Bite - These Tips Can Help You

Dog biting or puppy biting may seem cute in the beginning but this can turn into a real issue if you let it get out of control. While your training a dog not to bite there are many behavioral methods you should make use of.

Firstly, you have to understand the form of aggression your dog has that makes them bite. There are very a few of them but the two most ordinary ones are defensive aggression and inherited aggression.

* Defensive Aggression: Dogs are territorial by nature and they'll battle to defend their territory if they feel threatened. If you do not handle this issue accurately your dog may develop a defensive attitude when it comes to their food. This food aggression will cause them to threaten any individual that approaches them while they are eating by biting them.

* Inherited Aggression: Bad aggression and biting may be because of hereditary reasons. So if the dog's parents are aggressive then chances are they will develop aggressive traits as they grow older.

Additional forms of aggression that causes a dog to bite are pain aggression, fear or self defense aggression, dominance aggression, reactive aggression, and displacement aggression.

When you learn the kind of aggression that's causing your dog to bite you should start training him not to bite. The secret that the majority of dog owners do not recognize about stopping their dogs biting behavior is eliminating the cause of the aggression and treating the pattern that causes them to bite.

Once your dog bites he typically goes through a lot of barking, growling, contention, and maybe a warning snap. If you stop your dog's barking alone you will only be coaching your dog to go from a growl straight to the bite.

It is critical for you to treat this complete pattern once training a dog not to bite. If you may put an end to the complete pattern that leads up to the bite then you will prevent this behavior issue permanently.
