

Thoughts To Consider Before Selecting An Exotic Pet

An exotic pet may seem to fit your jet-setting lifestyle, you may like to do things differently, or feel that it will go better with your designer clothes and gourmet food. Consider the following before you choose an exotic pet.

An exotic pet is a wild animal, generally not domesticated or found living in people's homes. The broad definition includes birds, rodents and reptiles as well as other species. Unlike domesticated animals, your home is not their natural environment.

Although you may think an exotic pet is the ideal accessory, taking them from their natural habitat can be difficult as they are not tame or domesticated. Exotic pets have been known to attack people, even their owners.

How to Feed and Care for your Exotic Pet

Unlike domestic pets, you cannot pop down to the local supermarket for a bag of food for an exotic pet. They are used to feeding in the wild, eating whatever they can find in a day. Calculating how much to feed an exotic pet is difficult, and you may be surprised by the amount they eat. A hungry exotic pet is more likely to be a dangerous exotic pet too.

Your local veterinarian probably has little experience with exotic pets, who often have exotic illnesses. Finding a specialist who can treat a sick exotic pet may involve travel and considerable expense.

There Are Laws Governing Exotic Pets Too

Depending upon the location that you reside, you may be breaking the law if you have an exotic pet in your home. Before making the investment, do some research regarding the law of exotic pet ownership in your area. You may need to purchase a special license or obtain a permit.

Some localities require that you keep your exotic pet within the confines of your property. If this is the case, make sure that you have installed secure enclosures to prevent the animal from escaping. Once they are out in the neighborhood, the unfamiliar surroundings can frighten them and provoke a normally timid animal to attack. Pet buyers must understand that exotic animal are made available to the public for one reason, there is a market for these animals. It is the demand that drives the business. As a wise man once said, "just because you can do something, doesn't mean that you should." Now apply that theory to the purchase of a new pet. You may have the ability to buy the animal, but is it wise?
